Cynthia Bowers

Cynthia Bowers enjoys sharing the beauty of Innsbrook through her photography.

Bob Goulding

"I discovered turned wooden bowls about 20 years ago, in a gallery in the artist's colony of Mendocino, California. I was so taken by them that my wife gave me a wood lathe for Christmas that year, and I began to learn to turn. I prefer simple, elegant shapes, highlighting the natural color and grain of the wood. My bowls take many shapes and forms and each one is unique. Many of my bowls are made from the beautiful native woods of Missouri—Cherry, Walnut, Cedar, Maple and Oak. I also work with the exotic California burls—Redwood and Big Leaf Maple. The look, feel and smell of wood make it an extremely satisfying media in which to work. My work has been featured in several juried art shows in recent years. We have lived full-time in Innsbrook, on the shore of Lake Aspen, for 24 years."

NATURE NOTE

What is a Hairy Woodpecker?

The Hairy Woodpecker is a small but powerful bird that forages along trunks and main branches of large trees. It wields a much longer bill than the Downy Woodpecker's almost thornlike bill. Hairy Woodpeckers have a somewhat soldierly look, with their erect, straight-backed posture on tree trunks and their cleanly striped heads. Look for them at backyard suet or sunflower feeders, and listen for them whinnying from the forest.

Hairy Woodpeckers are contrasting in color (black and white). The black wings are checkered with white; the head has two white stripes (and, in males, a flash of red toward the back of the head). A large white patch runs down the center of the black back.

Hairy Woodpeckers hitch up tree trunks and along main branches. They sometimes feed at the bases of trees, along fallen logs, and even on the ground at times. They have the slowly undulating flight pattern of most woodpeckers.

Hairy Woodpeckers are found in forest edges, open woodlands of oak and pine, recently burned forests, and stands infested by bark beetles. Excerpt from <http://www.allaboutbirds.org>
