nature note

DON'T ADOPT WILDLIFE!

Spring brings the births of wild animals such as birds, rabbits and squirrels. With that come good intentions of kind-hearted people who want to adopt baby animals they find because they think they have been orphaned or abandoned.

The Missouri Department of Conservation reminds people to leave these young wild animals where they find them, or return them to their nests or nest areas if possible. Baby animals are rarely abandoned or orphaned. The wildlife parent is afraid of people and will retreat when you approach. If the baby animal is left alone, the parent will usually return. Also, parent animals cannot constantly attend to their young so often they spend many hours each day gathering food for the offspring. Most wild mothers do not abandon their young because of a human smell on them, and most baby wild animals do not survive in captivity.
