COME FLY WITH ME!

For the next few months, thousands of quacking, honking ducks and geese will be winging their way through Innsbrook and other parts of our state. Most waterfowl traveling through this region follow a path known as the Mississippi Flyway. Ducks and geese that travel along this flyway in the fall are coming from their nesting areas in the upper midwest and southern Canada. When ponds and lakes in the north start to freeze and food becomes scarce, ducks and geese move southward to warmer climates.

Blue-winged teal and pintails are the first ducks to arrive. The teal's powder-blue wing patches and the pintail's sharply pointed tail feathers make them easy to identify as they feed in ponds and marshes. The next batch to come through include ringnecks and scaup.

November's chilly winds will push these birds further south, but by then, large numbers of mallards will be here. Migrating Canada geese will arrive in early winter. Also stopping over around the same time are divers, several kinds of black and white ducks that rest and feed in the rough, frigid water of large lakes and rivers. These include common merganser and goldeneyes. Finally, there's the late arrival of the snow geese in December.
