NATURE NOTE

Why do Geese Fly in a 'V' Formation?

Among the most evocative sounds of early autumn are the voices of migratory geese, flying high overhead in a V-formation as they return from nesting in Canada and Alaska.

This phenomenon — a kind of synchronized, aerial tailgating — marks the flight of flocks of larger birds, like geese or pelicans, but isn't seen in smaller birds like robins or sandpipers.

Most observers believe there is a straightforward reason for flying in a V. Each bird behind the leader is taking advantage of the lift of a corkscrew of air coming off the wing tips of the bird in front. This corkscrew updraft is called a tip vortex. Such efficiency enables the geese to save considerable energy during long flights.

The V-formation may also enhance birds' ability to see and hear each other, thus avoiding mid-air collisions. So migrating birds that do form V-formations combine the benefits of aerial updrafts and communication.

Small birds probably do not create enough of an updraft to help others in the flock and don't fly in V-formation.
