NATURE NOTES

Downy Gentian

Downy gentian, or prairie gentian, is a beautifully blue or violet-blue wildflower with opposite leaves that blooms September through November in native grasslands. It is a perennial wildflower with erect or ascending stems that are minutely hairy, usually in lengthwise lines up the stem. The fine, white hairs, which give this plant its name, can be hard to see.

The stem leaves are opposite, simple, lance-shaped, and stalkless. It's hard to see, but the leaves are minutely hairy along the edge of the basal part of the blade, and along the larger veins on the leaf underside. The smaller leaves at the top of the plant are whorled on the stem.

Flowers arise in clusters of individual flowers at the tops of the plant stalks; petals are fused into a funnel-shaped tube, with the free portion of the outer lobes spreading at maturity, blue to bluish violet, sometimes darkening with age.

Several members of the gentian family live in Missouri, including two others in the genus Gentiana: closed gentian, or bottle gentian (G. andrewsii), and pale, white, or yellowish gentian (G. alba).

Downy gentian can interbreed and form hybrids with G. alba; these offspring are called G. x curtisii and have been documented from certain locations in Adair and Franklin counties where the two parent species grow near each other. The hybrid plants show characteristics intermediate between the parent plants.

As with other gentians, bumble bees are the principal pollinators, capable of cross-pollinating the plants; this is a reminder that a wide variety of bees and other pollinators are needed in order for our state to have a wide variety of plants.
